An Old Citizen of Cincinnati Restored Hearing.—In illustration of the success lich science can achieve, if directed by illfel hands, and when combined with skillful lands, and when combined with the necessary practical experience, we may cite the case of Mr. William Jones, who has recently been restored to hearing by Dr. Lighthill, at the Burnet House.

Mr. Jones, residing at No. 400 Race street, is an old citizen of Cincinnati, having resided here since 1816, and is now upward of seventy-live years of age. For the past twenty years he had been hard of hearing, and the difficulty increased to such an extent that within the past year or two he was not able to hear common or two he was not able to hear commo conversation, and had to be spoken to it a very loud tone of voice. Hearing of precui examination, that his case was not eyrond hope, he placed himself under centment, and in a short time had the attisfaction to find his hearing perfectly estored. Though we have at various mes chronicled the remarkable cures of deafness and catarrh which the Doctor has performed upon some of our most respectable citizens, the present case is the most remarkable of ull, and deserves more than a passing notice at our hands, both on account of the advanced age of the patient, and the long duration of the defective hearing. In New York and throughout the East Dr. Lighthill has long since been acknowledged as standing at the head of his profession in the special department to which he devotes his attention, and his success in Cincinnati fully confirms the good reports of him that have reached us, and establishes on a firm basis his well-merited reputation in the West. ness and eatarrh which the Docto medical cloris, I applied to Dr. Lighthill in February last, and, to my agreeable surprise. I in-proved from the very commencement of his treatment. The trouble-some cough diminished, the breathing became free and natural, the distress in my throat disappeared, and my hearing was restored, so that I now can hear preaching in the most distant part of the church n the most distant part of the church.

STORY OF A BLIND POET. Delille at the Cadran Bleu.

Translated from 1 4 From h for th N Y De-The recollection of the pers us and places that promoted our happiness in the jeyous days of youth is seldom ethaced from the mind. We adhere to it as closely as does the perfume to the wase from which it has been taken. The more ardent and lively the imagination, the more profound is its impression, the more durable its effects. Thus Deldle, in his old aged, loved to recount the literary festivals in which he had in youth participated, at a time when his genius had been displayed by the sublime productions of his peu.

Literary career.

This party never occurred to Delille unaccompanied with the most delightful associations, while it inspired him with a predilection for the "Cadran Bleu," which no other sentiment could offace. Every no other sentiment could efface Every year, on the return of Spring, he repaired thither with his friends, as he said, to a public dinner. He loved to mingle with the numerous visitors whom he was a reof meeting there to listen to the various conversations which occasionally reach dhim, and to analyze the different remarks which were mide around him. He delighted there to observe the most opposite extremes of character, the jy of some, the impatience of others, the politeness of these, the rudeness of these in a word, there was in the sphere of the salon. a motion, a life, an abundance, which capi-vated the imag nation by their amis ng variety; and, as he observe, "seemed to restore the health, to calm the universal of to prepare the mind for opening itself to

The rapid increase of his fame now reudered it almost impose the firm to appear in public without being a reounded by a crowd of admirers. Whose just and flattering homage shocked the native medesty of the post, nor wan this the only trial he was onlyed to endure, for about this time he had the misfortune at too go his sight. Perhaps no one ever suffered more in being compelled to withdraw from the bustling sceues of life than Deille. He seemed from thence to draw a new source of joy and fresh inspiration. ew source of joy and fresh inspiration

In va'n did they represent to him that he would be known, and assailed on all sides by the crowd, and that at his age it was imprudent to expose himself to the fatigue of appearing in public. He replied to their objections only by repeating in the supplicating voice of a child. Tet us once more dine at the 'Cadran Bleu.'

How could these reiterated outgesties he How could these reiterated untreaties be resisted? A faithful friend of Dellle, whom he always called his Antig ne, i rmed a plan to satisfy the ardent deare of the poet without exposing him to the danger of mingling in public. Occupying a large and spacions house in the suluriest Germain, he resolved so to prepare it that he lie, when there, might suppose his wishes had been executed.

The appointed day arrived, to the gration of Dellle. He was does sed, and seemed to count the hors that must elapse ere he should mingle with the numerous visitors on the ramparts. At engilithe carriage arrived, and proceeded of the spinrip St. Germain, with his three triends and Madaeth Little.

In the meanwhile a kind of dispute arose at the next table, Delille was attentive, but could gather only these words, "priority," "custom," "security. "I see," said the poet, smiling, "that we have courtiers and bankers near us, there must be a rise in the funds this morning.

From another tale was heard the bud talking of three women, whose immoderate laughter led the poet to believe them the wives of rich merchants, from the Isle of Lanviers, who, in the absence of their husbands, were feasting together.

"Oh, 'cried Delille, "if I were a young man, what pleasure should I experience in provoking those three ladies, and discussing matters for half an hour. I never heard more original observations, nor more diverting remarks."

When the first course was removed, the friend of Delille arose and said emphatically, "Well, my dear Delille, do you feel at your case?"

"Do not pronounce my name so loudly, I shall be known, and obliged to retire."

This conversation was scarcely finished when a member of the Academy came up, and in the dialect of an inhabitant of the port of St. Bernard, cried:

"Ah, what do I hear: you are doubtless the great wine merchant of Marmouset street?"

"No, six, no. I am not a wine merchant,

"No, sir, no. I am not a wine merchant, am I, my dear?" said he to Madame Delile, with the most gracious smile.

"Do not think of deceiving me," replied his companion, "I know my man, and have not forgotten the good glasses of wine that I have drunk in your shop. As I shall in swo honts take the diligence to Auserre, if you have any commands I will execute them; I am one of the family Bertz, and "Gentlemen and ladies—we have the honor of singing before you the sacred song of St James—not James the H rmit. nor James of Conpostella nor James the Less—lut James the Greater, or in other words, James Delille, at once the Homer and Virgil of French poetry! The harps vibrated immediately under the flugers of the young artists, who added in the most harmonious voice, the whole life of the poet, from his infancy at Limanque to his last return to Paris. When they had ceased, Delille seized the arm of his friend.
